Program Description

The Drafting, Planning, and Design Concentration was developed to prepare students as managers in the production of documents and drawings that communicate design needs and specifications. Three important components in the concentration are drafting and design courses, business administration courses and computer information systems courses.

The core of study in Drafting, Planning, and Design includes mechanical and architectural drafting, computer rendering, design project presentation, and exposure to various softwares and applications. Courses in business administration provide a good foundation in the areas of management, administration, and human relations. Courses include an overview of accounting, statistics, and marketing and human resource management. The computer (CIS) component includes classes on hardware, operating systems and networking. The CIS courses provide a strong set of computing skills that are necessary for success in a technology related field of study.
